phenomena with high destructive potential that have materialized in events with social and economic catastrophic consequences for people and governments during the last decades show the urgent need to investigate the issue of prevention this thesis aims The to analyze and discuss the strategies used in managing risk and provide possible strategies for intervention in the countries affected by natural disasters the analysis of different study cases allows to evaluate the best and the worst planning practices employed in different times and contexts the circumstances that let the disaster happened and why a country is considered more or less vulnerable the review of the study cases includes the analysis of the concepts of emergency architecture emergency planning and post disaster reconstruction with the purpose of understanding the contributions provided by the architecture the governments the citizens and the institutions responsible for disaster management in such situations the study cases that have been selected are representative samples of the different possible scenarios in the world Italy Chile Japan and the United States have a high exposure to seismic and hydro meteorological natural phenomena with a high destructive potential all the four countries have shown that a high level of exposure combined with accentuated features of social economic physical environmental and political vulnerability generates an increasing incidence of disasters one of the main reasons at the base of the choice of the study cases is that i have lived in person the experience of the disasters and i took part in the reconstruction practices in some of the countries selected the purpose of this thesis is to provide some basic tools to reduce risk of natural disasters by defining a new approach to both disaster management and prevention of emergency that is formulated in the frame of urban ecology It aims to develop a database and a set of indicators of global observation with a level of local detail that are supposed to aid the understanding of the complex manifestations of the risk in different situations the strategies that should be developed in order to reduce the degree of disaster risk are defined and ordered according to different levels of intervention planning at geographical urban and building scale regulatory and social policies and actions implemented by the governments even if great progresses have been made in the field of the natural disasters management there is an urgent need to approach the topic of the risk from a new point of view for sure adopting some new guidelines will not prevent a catastrophic event to occur but will contribute to promoting a culture of prevention and disaster risk reduction aimed at more sustainable human development the concept of vulnerability redefined the manner in which disasters are theorized and interpreted from geophysical events to sociocultural constructions at the same time understanding vulnerability became critical to orient disaster risk reduction strategies still there is one major shortcoming of this concept that is the lack of integration of the temporal dimension and in particular the historical context in the theorization and analysis of vulnerability therefore this dissertation focuses on the contextualization of vulnerability from a historical perspective grounded on a political ecological theoretical framework this study investigates a period of 215 years 1800 2015 in the history of Madeira Island Portugal in order to understand how the historical evolution of political economic and social processes shaped the vulnerability to disasters on the island also the sociocultural adaptations to disasters will be discussed to address the strategies and practices developed by the Madeirans to adapt to a hazardous environment and to mitigate their sociostructural vulnerabilities a historical research design and qualitative methods were adopted for the purpose of this dissertation findings from this study indicate that the disasters that occurred in Madeira from 1800 to 2015 resulted from the interactions between hazards and vulnerabilities associated with the Madeiran society which emerged and were produced transmitted and transformed by political economic and social processes despite the structural changes that the island underwent in the last two centuries political administrative changes changes in the systems of production and changes in Matters social organization these processes kept propagating vulnerabilities that were exploited by hazards leading to disasters vulnerability is therefore inherent to the Madeiran society since it develops from the political economic and social processes on which it was and is structured another finding from this study is that despite various of the sociocultural adaptations to the environment that were developed by the Madeirans over time none were truly effective in the mitigation of vulnerability which explains the historical record of disaster on the island the previous findings demonstrate that a political ecological framework is appropriate to contextualize vulnerability from a historical perspective it reveals how the broader processes of vulnerability account for a disaster event frames how the root causes of vulnerability evolve over time and identifies the adaptive patterns that arise from the human environment relationship so it is critical to integrate the temporal dimension in the analysis of vulnerability and to adopt a contextual approach to frame vulnerability instead of cataloguing people or societies as vulnerable or not vulnerable we must focus first on interpreting and contextualizing the root causes and the driving forces of their vulnerability this study also contributes to the body of knowledge on small islands vulnerability despite being integrated in a strong political economic union the European Union Madeira shares similar vulnerabilities of other small islands worldwide its colonial past coupled with the model of development adopted over the last 40 years by political economic and social actors explains its present day vulnerabilities the integration in the European Union fostered socioeconomic and territorial development in Madeira that reduced its population s vulnerability but it also stimulated and sponsored a development strategy that clashed with risk reduction and that exacerbated vulnerability risk and disasters an analysis of a proposal to denuclearize Central Europe made by Poland in 1957 its radical rejection by the West especially the US is discussed in detail Hart whether the US decision was wise or hasty is the thrust of this work annotation copyrighted by Book News
